When Dr. Travers and I were started, at last, for the hosienda, I thought of what Daddy Lorimer had decided about us when he found that we had left the yacht together. I felt hysterical and awfully sorry for myself. It seemed dreadful that he who had loved me so should harbor such a dreadful notion about me. Travers drove the ear. We seldom spoke as we tore along but I knew that he was brooding over the disaster from which he we were leaving behind us and that which we were about to face. I couldn't plan what to do at the bacienda, and Travers knew nothing whatever of the situation there. We would have to adapt ourselves to eicumentances as we foggad them.

ever I reached he sare comfort of the Lorimer house again, I was done with adventure forever and forever.

I had discovered that what looks like adventure in fiction is unadulterated hardship in experience.
